What's setting Dressed Design apart these days isn't the life-size brass Great Dane statue in the showroom or the cosmopolitan designers who keep their eyes on trends the world over.

With supply chains still bogged down in the second year of the pandemic, Dressed Design's clients aren't waiting for furniture or materials sitting on a container ship outside the Port of Long Beach.

"We are not only a design company, but a custom furnishings manufacturing group, all U.S. made and delivered in less than 40 days, which is vital and unprecedented right now," said President and Founder Beth Ann Shepherd.

The Main Street storefront is the tip of an iceberg that includes three different workshops that manufacture furniture and are even serving other design groups caught up in delays.

She said the pandemic has made people appreciate time spent indoors with family.

"Home is cool again," she said.

Shepherd described her firm as edgy and chic, providing an alternative to traditional ski cabin design and fueled by jet-setting associates who collectively speak five languages.

"If you want brown on brown with the brown thrown in, I can give you a million other people," she said.

Paula Berg Design Associates has won numerous awards from the American Society of Interior Designers, according to its website, and Berg says what distinguishes her is her ability to listen to clients to develop an understanding of what their home should look like.

The firm is often brought in to a project in its early stages to inform material choices, and it prides itself on paying attention to the finest detail.

"That makes the difference between a designed house and a designed home," the website states.

Operating out of a large showroom near the creek that inspired its name, Poison Creek Furniture and Design offers custom home design and decor from "mountain to modern," according to its website.

"We offer furniture for every space, and our design staff is on hand to help guide you through the design process, from picking the right fabric for your lifestyle, to perfectly placing all of your furniture in your home," the firm states. "We love obsessing over the details, listening to your needs, and getting everything just right."
